Adventure Filmmaker

Sarah Begum travels around the world, but the people she meets and their lives interest her more than where they are from. Wherever she goes, whether it's deep in the Amazonian rainforest or to a football match in Krakow, Poland, Sarah looks for the human story in the situation and records her experiences to later share them with the world through her documentary films, articles and public talks.

Sarah first became interested in knowing about people from other places when she was 9, after studying about the trees that were being cut down by big companies for the wood or land in the Amazon, and the effects this was having on the local people who lived there. "I had visions of tribal people calling me," she says. "Since then, the dreams became stronger and the urge to travel to see the tribes increased."

At the age of 21, while studying for a degree in filmmaking at Kingston University, Sarah, from London, England decided the time had come to make her dream come true. "I wanted to do something with my life and for my future, so I decided to literally follow my dream. I did some research about this tribe in the Amazon and just went there," she says. This would be the most important journey of her life so far, travelling 9,300 kilometres from home, deep into the Ecuadorian jungle.

Once in Ecuador, Sarah met up with sound engineer Stephen Bull and cinematographer Frank Angelcyk and taught English to children in the Amazon region for two weeks. They then set off on a two-day boat trip through waters full of alligators and piranha fish to get to the village where the Huaorani people live. When they arrived, they were greeted and made welcome by the villagers who communicated with gestures and the little Spanish they knew.

Sarah made a thirty-minute documentary about the Huaorani way of life, through her experiences with them. She hunted with warriors, joined the women in their activities and was chosen to become a member of the tribe. But the scariest moment was when they told her to take off her clothes and the women began to dress her as a bride. "I was chosen... and I had no idea what was going to happen to me," she says. But she soon discovered that the ceremony didn't make her a married woman in any legal sense and was just part of being welcomed into the tribe.

Since then, Sarah has continued to travel, meeting dangerous football fans in Poland to find out why their gangs fight, crossing the United States to meet Native Americans and understand their problems and climbing the Atlas Mountains of Morocco where she was adopted by a Berber woman. Whatever she decides to do next, wherever it may be, it's the people she meets who will breathe life into Sarah's adventure, and it will be their story she wants to tell.
